Honestly, I was getting a little bored of the generic fantasy RPG's at this point. I was seeing the same thing over and over in virtually every game. "It's a world, this is a sword and this is a shield... make sure you pick the right combination.". On one hand I appreciate fantasy games being generic. It's a really cheap way to create a character. If a new company came out with a generic fantasy RPG it would probably go under, so you can't blame them for doing it. BUT, it's starting to get very repetitive. You think back to Skyrim, a decade ago, the world was way more colorful. You had to become good friends with everyone in your town. Part of the game was hunting and gathering. It was a perfect game, except for the fact it was way too big and too repetitive. I have also played numerous games like Bravely Default, Puzzle & Dragons, The World Ends With You, Dragon Quest, etc. And I can see the same thing. While it doesn't feel like you are doing it from scratch, the world that you visit is going to feel like it was played out before. You visit these generic zones and spend the day doing your daily grind. I think that things are starting to change. I am seeing more games that give you something else. I am seeing characters in these games that I relate to. I am seeing games that want to be something more, that want to try and be something original. That is great. I just wonder if they can do it. Then again, I've been waiting for the same thing since I first picked up a Dragon Quest game. Personally, I have been loving Dragon Quest Builders, an action RPG game from Square Enix. For the longest time, I have been waiting for the sequel to Final Fantasy XV: The Dawn of the Future. Square Enix has a huge catalog of Final Fantasy games and I am looking forward to the future of the franchise. I have also been interested in the Beyblade series. I was born in the 90's and that was pretty much where the Beyblade series started. It's a pretty popular franchise in Japan and they have a pretty big following over here. I have an interest in the franchise. I've watched the franchise grow over the years and it's really cool to see that, but that💎 bff6bb2d33
